Renewable Energy

June 11, 2020

EHS & Sustainability teams are spread thin right now, but there are still corporate sustainability goals that you're trying to achieve. One straightforward, attainable way to get a jump start on those goals in a challenging business year is by leveraging renewable energy incentive programs.

Hodgson Russ attorney Michael Hecker participated in this discussion on how clean energy can contribute toward ESG goals, cost-effective opportunities for procurement, and clean energy attributes.

What you will learn

- How businesses can pursue ESG goals in an economically feasible way that minimizes legal and financial risk
- State-level policies that offer promising, cost-effective opportunities for commercial procurement of clean energy and clean energy attributes

Cost: Free for NAEM members; $99 for non-members
